Re: STB Ex Parte No. 582 (Sub-No. 1)

Gentlemen:

These comments are submitted in reference to the Board's proposed rulemaking in the captioned proceeding.

United Rail Passenger Alliance ("URPA") respectfully urges the Board to give greater attention in the proposed regulation to the impact of future rail carrier consolidations on existing, and prospective, intercity, regional and commuter rail passenger services. The draft regulation mentions passenger impacts only once (at § 1180.1(c)(2)(ii)), and then only in a passing reference to addressing potential harm to existing services. URPA submits that this treatment of impacts on passenger services is grossly deficient.

The record is quite clear that recent consolidations of large rail carriers has significantly impaired the provision of intercity rail passenger services currently operated by the National Railroad Passenger Corporation ("NRPC" or "Amtrak"). Indeed, Amtrak's Orlando-New Orleans-Los Angeles and its Chicago-San Antonio-Los Angeles routes are to this day suffering continuing and very serious adverse impact from both the Union Pacific acquisition of the Southern Pacific, and CSX's acquisition of parts of Conrail. Other Amtrak routes between the Northeast and the Midwest also suffered serious degradation of service as a direct consequence of the division on Conrail between CSX and Norfolk Southern, as did certain commuter and regional rail passenger operations in the Washington, D.C. and Chicago areas.

Older combinations of Class 1 railroads have eliminated altogether routes used by NRPC trains (e.g., the former SAL main lines between Petersburg, Virginia, and Raleigh, North Carolina, and between Jacksonville, Florida, and Savannah, Georgia).

Past consolidations of large rail carriers have also adversely affected not just existing intercity, regional and commuter rail operations, but prospective ones as well. For example, the UP-SP transaction resulted in changes in rail freight traffic flows that have precluded the restoration of rail passenger service between Salt Lake City, Boise and Portland, and, though abandonment or embargo of critical line segments, service to Phoenix and the potential inauguration of new service between Texas and the Pacific Northwest over the former D&RGW line over Tennessee Pass in Colorado. Another, older, example is the elimination of the former ACL main line on the west coast of Florida.

The Board is well aware of the growth in the past decade in new commuter rail and regional rail passenger services in numerous markets throughout the United States. This trend is continuing. New or expanded commuter rail services have been launched in Connecticut, Virginia, Chicago, Dallas and San Francisco. Explosive growth has occurred in regional rail passenger services in such markets as Miami-West Palm Beach, Los Angeles, San Diego, Stockton-San Jose, and Seattle-Tacoma. New regional rail services are under development in numerous areas, including Virginia, Minnesota, Texas, California, Washington and New England. Failure to require complete evaluation of impacts of combinations of host railroads on both existing and prospective commuter and regional rail passenger services could have a preclusive impact on their future growth and further development, which would plainly be hostile to the public interest in fostering growth of popular and effective rail transit alternatives to our overcrowded highways.

The impact of large carrier mergers on future development of intercity and interregional rail passenger services operated, or to be operated, by NRPC or other future providers of this popular service could be equally profound. Entire routes and major cities have been lost to rail passenger services as a result of past consolidations. Future growth in train frequencies in long distance markets, and the expansion of service into new markets (e.g., Texas-Colorado, or Chicago-Florida) could be equally impacted by future transactions. Unless the board requires complete review of merger impacts on both current and prospective passenger services in future transactions, it will be impossible for Congress, states, cities, regional multistate agencies, and private businesses interested in rail passenger services, both existing and prospective, to understand and take appropriate ameliorative actions regarding these transactions.

Mergers need not always have negative effects. The consolidation of the Canadian National and Illinois Central railroads was completed without noticeable disruption to affected commuter, regional or intercity rail passenger services. But careful advance consideration of potential impacts will help assure that kind of outcome.

For these reasons, URPA respectfully urges the Board to incorporate into the proposed regulations a fully-articulated requirement that the parties to a covered transaction provide a complete evaluation of the impacts of the transaction on both existing and prospective commuter, regional and intercity rail passenger services.

URPA is a Florida not-for-profit organization that functions as a public policy development institution and an information resource to public officials and agencies concerning rail passenger transportation matters. URPA is not affiliated with any other agency or organization.

Respectfully submitted,

UNITED RAIL PASSENGER ALLIANCE
